The photos in this show are printed by the photographer himself in a traditional wet darkroom. Quality fiber-based printing papers were used. Prints were processed to maximize longevity through careful fixing, use of a wash aid, selenium toning, and extended washing to remove contaminants. They were then dry-mounted and matted onto museum-quality 100% rag board before framing.

With traditional darkrooms rapidly being replaced by more convenient digital printing methods, fiber-based photograph prints like these are becoming an increasingly rare medium. In addition, carefully made darkroom black and white prints on fiber paper are shown to have an extremely long life. Reasonable care of the photograph (avoid strong pollutants or damp locations, etc.) will help maximize print life.

The unique appearance of traditional darkroom prints and their proven longevity make them an attractive option for display or collection.
